“ When Valerie was born I was almost 6 and I marveled at her tiny, tiny fingers and toes. She quickly developed her quirky personality and by the time she began to talk she had created her imaginary friend Drumla Brown. She would talk to Drumla very earnestly all the time for a year or more. But her constant companion growing up was her sister Carla. Where Carla was there was Val. I thought of them as a unit "the girls" as they were often referred to by the family. As they grew up they had many adventures together. Valerie was a sweet, shy child and would often run hide when company came to the house when she was very small. Thinking about here is bitter sweet, she had so much to live for and has gone far to soon. We all loved her very much.
